Since the advent of the disposable razor, numerous improvements in razor design have been proposed. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 4,765,531 proposes a razor assembly having a rigid housing and a disposable razor blade mounted to a hub and rotatably supported within the housing. One end of the razor blade is received in a slot in the housing, and the blade is rotated into contact with a shaving surface during use. The blade is designed for single use, and must be discarded. U.S. Pat. No. 4,955,927 also discloses a disposable razor assembly. The blade is again rotatably mounted within a housing, and the razor is designed for single use, and must be discarded. U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,342,014 and 5,366,442 disclose a razor assembly in which a razor blade is rotatably mounted in a housing. The blade is received in a slot in the housing, and an end cap is moved from a first position to a second position during use, automatically ejecting the blade from the housing. U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,362,111 and 5,372,400 disclose a disposable razor assembly which includes a rigid housing and a disposable razor blade mounted to a hub rotatably supported in the housing. U.S. Pat. No. 4,328,547 discloses a razor assembly having a rigid housing and a disposable razor blade rotatably supported within the housing. The blade is rotated during use, and the housing has means for ejecting the blade from the housing. As mentioned above, the disposable razor assembly disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 4,328,547 is designed for multiple use, and is structured to eject the razor blade from the housing for disposal. The razor assembly has a main housing and an end cap. The end cap is provided with means for matingly receiving a conventional disposable razor blade, and has a slot to accommodate the hub of the razor blade. The end cap is placed over the main housing during assembly of the razor assembly, and the main housing is placed over the end cap during use. The end cap and the main housing include a band formed in the outer periphery of the housing which is configured to
