of the Invention The present invention relates to a sheet conveying apparatus for conveying a sheet by using a conveying member. 2. Description of the Related Art Conventionally, in a printing apparatus or a copying apparatus, such a structure is known as described in Japanese Patent Unexamined Publication No.
2010-146826, in which a sheet is sequentially conveyed through a concave portion of a conveying guide member, which is arranged above an image forming unit, to a printing unit. However, as the conveying guide member is arranged with an opening on a downstream side in the conveying direction, a sheet is caused to descend along the conveying guide member and is then conveyed to the printing unit along a supporting member. Accordingly, a descending distance of the sheet becomes relatively long and a fall height of the sheet to the supporting member becomes large. As a result, a top end of the sheet is brought into contact with a bottom surface of Drinking Water and the Development of Lymphoid Tissue in the Early Insectivorous Lizard Selenodontophrys parasitica: A Hematological Perspective. The immune system of reptiles has been intensely studied in relation to skin, integument, and other systems. The role of the hematopoietic system and the associated lymphoid organs in reptiles as well as the reaction of lymphoid organs to systemic immune challenges have been thoroughly described in reptiles. The lymphoid organs of lizard skin can develop during the embryo stage with varying degrees of maturation. The lizards in this study, the Early Insectivorous Lizard Selenodontophrys parasitica, were raised in captivity and sampled for hematological analysis at their different life stages (newly hatched, 16.5 days after hatching, 22.7 days after hatching, and one month post hatching). The hematological results showed that young larvae had lower total leukocyte and lymphocyte counts than adults. The lymphocyte subpopulations varied in different developmental stages but did not seem to be affected by the feeding conditions. The larval immune response was immature. Total lymphocyte count and two- and four-way lymphocyte subpopulations increased in three-month-old lizards, which was supported by the increase in total body mass. The adult lizard was apparently prone to developing inflammatory nodules of the lung. Although the embryonic organ structure and the response to immune challenges may differ
