Cystic fibrosis transmembrane conductance regulator (CFTR) is a cAMP-activated chloride channel expressed in the apical membrane of a variety of epithelial cells. Here, we have studied its effect in the regulation of epithelial sodium transport. We have used freshly isolated rat collecting ducts (CD) and micropuncture of the superficial ascending limb of Henle's loop (sAL). Our results show that CFTR activity is present in the CD and the sAL. First, CFTR protein and chloride current were detected in the apical membrane of CD principal cells and cells from the sAL. Second, functional CFTR was activated by cAMP. Moreover, the CFTR chloride conductance activated by cAMP was inhibited by glybenclamide, 1,9-bis-anthracenylmethylcyclohexylsulfonate (DIOA), and tamoxifen (TMX). In contrast, amiloride and 4,4'-diisothiocyanatostilbene-2,2'-disulfonic acid (DIDS) did not affect the CFTR current. Finally, CFTR stimulation by cAMP resulted in inhibition of the basolateral potassium conductance. The inhibition of this potassium conductance could play a role in the sodium reabsorption control in the CD. Our results show that CFTR activity is present in the CD and the sAL, and that the CFTR chloride current activated by cAMP is regulated by phosphorylation. This chloride channel is involved in the cAMP-mediated inhibition of basolateral potassium conductance, which is important for the regulation of sodium reabsorption.Photonic band gap materials have recently received substantial attention for their potential
