In a typical hard disk drive, a plurality of magnetic heads is provided to write and read data to and from the surface of a magnetic disk. The heads are typically supported and positioned in close proximity to the surface of the disk by a suspension assembly coupled to an actuator arm. The actuator arm is driven by a voice coil motor to position the heads over selected tracks of the disk. The magnetic heads, typically a slider having an air bearing surface, includes a read element for reading data from and a write element for writing data to the disk. The slider and the read/write elements are coupled to a suspension assembly that supports the head and biases the head toward the disk surface. The suspension assembly, in turn, is coupled to an actuator arm that holds the suspension assembly in the desired position. As magnetic disk drives have become smaller and smaller, it is increasingly important to reduce the size of the head suspension assembly. One approach has been to mount the read/write elements directly to the suspension assembly. This approach is disclosed in U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,274,599 and 5,400,087. An example of a read/write element and suspension assembly is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 5,426,552. Such an approach enables smaller and more compact head suspension assemblies. However, many conventional disk drive suspension assemblies are larger than the read/write elements, thus limiting the number of read/write elements that can be mounted to the suspension assembly. Also, the size of the head suspension assembly tends to be a significant factor in the cost of the disk drive. In accordance with the invention, a head suspension assembly is provided for use in a disk drive that includes a baseplate, an actuator arm having a pivot end and a head end, and a suspension assembly pivotally coupling the head end of the actuator arm to the pivot end of the baseplate. The head suspension assembly also includes a head stack assembly pivotally coupled to the head end of the actuator arm, the head stack assembly including at least one head gimbal assembly having a gimbal
