Description of the Related Art Since the octane number of fuels for engines has been raised in recent years, the engine is liable to misfire. When the engine is in a misfire state, the engine noise increases and the temperature of the engine may be raised. Consequently, the engine is stopped before the engine is damaged. In this way, as described above, if a vehicle is running on a mountain road for example, and the engine is in a misfire state, the driver can be frightened and be confused. Consequently, there has been developed a technique for reliably detecting a misfire of the engine. As the misfire detection technique described above, there has been known a technique for detecting a misfire of an engine on the basis of a knocking determination signal (NON signal) generated during the operation of an engine. However, when detecting the misfire of the engine by the conventional technique, a misfire determination signal (NON signal) is used. In this case, the signal is generated by an ultrasonic sensor and the frequency of the signal is varied when the detection range is changed. If the detection range is varied depending on the engine speed, however, a problem arises in ba244e880a
