There is a ton of variability in the daily schedule of clinical trial investigators. One thing that varies from investigator to investigator is the number of hours they will spend conducting a trial. What is the typical number of hours per day for a clinical trial investigator? I'm particularly interested in what the typical day looks like for academic clinical trial investigators. Most of the questions that I have seen focus on clinical trial investigators who work for the company or university. A: I can address this question specifically for my institution. Generally, a clinical trial investigator's typical day is: a primary investigator in charge of the day-to-day execution of a trial. One of the more junior investigators would be responsible for training new study personnel, and possibly being in charge of that. Or, in the case of a clinical pharmacology trial, be in charge of making up study medication. However, I will often work with investigators who have multiple roles (such as being on the lead study, and being a study coordinator). Typically, investigators of this type will: have a 5AM to 7AM shift (that can vary according to clinical trial and study protocol). They would then go to work. In the evening, investigators will generally still work, but with more flexible hours. By flexible, I mean that the primary investigator will generally
