A label-free quantitative analysis of live cells based on an integrated microfluidic chip combining microfluidic manipulation and fluorescence correlation spectroscopy (FCS) is demonstrated. The microfluidic chip integrates flow-through cells and microfluidics, and allows access to homogeneous liquids in a micro-volume. By introducing a cell suspension into a microfluidic channel, cells can be counted and sorted automatically. Using the label-free approach, cells are directly counted and identified in a closed-loop after FCS measurements. We quantitatively determined the average cell size and cell cycle phase distributions in a cell population. These results are in good agreement with those obtained by commonly-used methods, such as nuclear staining and flow cytometry. This is the first label-free
