A review of the interaction between macrolides and cytochrome P450 3A enzymes. Macrolides are commonly used in the treatment of a variety of respiratory tract diseases. However, the use of these compounds has been associated with adverse drug reactions, including drug interactions. Several in vitro studies suggest that macrolides are capable of inhibiting the activity of cytochrome P450 (CYP) 3A enzymes and subsequently reducing the elimination of the orally administered CYP3A substrates. However, in vivo data are limited and limited to the oral route of administration. Moreover, information on the interactions between CYP3A and macrolides are particularly limited, with only one clinical study published to date. In vitro data demonstrate that erythromycin may be an inhibitor of CYP3A4 activity, with an IC(50) value of 15.7 microM. In contrast, other macrolides with a long half-life, such as azithromycin, may have very little, if any, effect on the metabolism of CYP3A substrates. Furthermore, interactions between macrolides and CYP3A substrates have not been demonstrated in vivo. In a study in healthy subjects, a dose-dependent increase in midazolam and triazolam half-life was observed following treatment with clarithromycin. However, the effects of macrolides on CYP3A metabolism are likely to be clinically significant only in cases of altered metabolism, e.g. when patients are concurrently taking medications known to affect CYP3A4 activity. These interactions may also be influenced by various CYP3A4-inducing or -inhibiting medications.Paratuberculosis in wild rabbit populations: United States, 2002.
