The department's top lobbyist, director of policy Marc Horne, said the money will be used to "advance the goals of the department, which includes increasing transparency and accountability in the education and training system, improving access to services and programs and improving the ability to conduct research on a number of issues that impact public education." Of the $9 million the department spent, $9 million was funded by the Telecommunication and Information Administration, which is the division of the department that oversees the Universal Service Fund. The portion of the Universal Service Fund that supports the Connect2Compete program helped the department to put $2.7 million into online classes. Another $2.3 million came from the same fund to pay for a study on digital readiness and digital skills. Horne said that the remaining $2.8 million came from an account that is supposed to be used for economic development projects. All these accounts have been challenged by Republican lawmakers who point out that they were given money by the Obama administration
