Not only can it make a person physically sick and feverish, but it can also harm the brain. Left untreated, meningitis can lead to permanent disability, memory loss, and even death. More men than women are victims of meningitis, and its occurrence is more common in children, with an estimated 1.7 million cases reported in the U.S. each year. But it's important for all men to be vaccinated against the disease, which can be prevented with two shots. The first shot is given to infants as soon as they're old enough to be vaccinated, and a second shot is given to adults at least two weeks later. Make sure both doses get a shot of the meningococcal-containing vaccine, which targets the serogroup B strain of the disease. The first shot is given at 10 days of age.
